The Brooklyn Theatre Fire.

The following graphic extract is taken from the New York Herald's account of the horrors attending the burning of the Brooklyn Theatre :

When the alarm of fire first rang through the house there was a momentary pause of horror, the people crowded in the galleries seemed to feel the hopelessness of their posttion, and the bravest hearts were momentarily stilled. For a moment stupor seized all minds, but for a moment only, and was succeeded by a fractic impulse to escape. Men and women rose with a common instinct to flee. Each one thought only of himself, the strong descrited the weak, and sudden as thought men and women were scrambling for the doors. In some hearts the better and nobler nature asserted itself, and men who had deserted friends under the first selfish impulse, rushed back to save those they loved. It was a terrible moment, the danger which had only threatened was now upon the unfortunate mass crowded into the dress and family circles—some seven fundred and fifty souls all told. The spark of tire from the flies which had caused the first terror had moved steadily and serpent-like till it had reached the wings, moving with the stealth and rapidity of a beast of prey. Then and leniy seizing on the scenery, it enveloped the stage in a sheet of flame. This was the end of hope.

What each one had feared had come, and there rose from the trapped and freightened mass of humanity a cry of despair and horror that was heard outside the wall of the theatre and called to the scene the police, who were fortunately within easy reach.

knowing what they were about. All sense of humanity was lost in the one absorbing thought of reaching the stairs. Men and women jumped from seat to seat, not stopping to pick up those that fell. The fight for life was begun. Behind, the crackling flames had seized upon the stage and were rapidly advancing through the house. Huge clouds of suffocating smoke floated inward, and filled every nook and cranny, rendering breathing almost impossible. There was no time to be lost. Every instant seemed an age to the agonized wretches who struggled at the doors to reach the outlet. Women screamed and fainted, and strong men struggled desperately in that awful crush.

At last the stairs were reached, and those who had been lucky enough to get to them first poured down to the corridor of the dress circle. For a moment the stream flowed freely, but the crowd behind pressed on fiercely. The fire behind was growing more intense and the smoke blinding. The occupants of the family circle, descending by the stairs that led to the vestibule of the dress circle, which promised the best means of escape, were met by the stream of people flying from the dress circle for their lives. The two streams meeting at the head of the steirs almost immediately formed an obstruction. The flames were gaining with inconceivable rapidity. Panie had seized all hearts and blind instinct had taken the place of reason. There was but one savage thought in all breasts—to save themselves at any cost. The stairs led to safety. Then the stairs should be made to do their work, and the mad mass rushed forward, pushing those before them on to the stairway till it was choked up with a mingled mass of men and women-a human mingled mass of men and women—a human Pride of Virginia, Hiawatha and other brands wedge that became more compact the closer it at factory prices. Always keeps a large stock was driven: but these terrified men did not in store. Call and see him, at No. 71 King st., was driven; but these terrified men did not reason, they did not think, they only knew that the outlet was by the stairs, and the stairs should do their work. But, alas! the stairway was only seven or eight feet wide, and 750 men and women sought to drive through this narrow passage all together, and it was impossible. But the fire behind grew apace and those in the rear could and would not understand that those in front could not get out of their way immediately, and they crushed forward and urged, with frantic yells, the clearing of the way. Some saw a ready way of escape and jumped over the banisters on the heads of those below. Every means was lawful-there was no thought but how to reach the street, to escape with precious life. In this dreadful struggle the weak fainted, and the strong, pressed against them by these in the rear, fell over their weaker companions, who struggled to regain their feet, but were trampled upon by others, who, in turn, were hurled into the struggling mass by those behind. Once fallen it was impossible to rise. Now arose the frenzied cries of those who had gone down in the melec, mingled with the groans of the wounded and the death rattle of the dying. Women shrieked in an agony of fear, and men with elecched teeth struggled savagely to regain their vantage. But their struggles were as vain as the cries of the women. The inexorable fates held them in their grasp, and would not let go their hold. And now the fire had wrapped in its terrible embraces the auditorium. On all sides the larid flames shot forth and about, licking with a thousand fierce tongues whatever was combustible in the building and rapidly cutting off all hope of escape from the wretches imprisoned on the stairs. But quicker than came the flames rolled in the blinding, choking smoke, tilling the eyes and the throats of the victims. Exhausted by their struggles the wedged in crowd ceased the violence of their efforts and gasped for air, pure untainted air, but received only the asphyxiating fumes of the burning wood and paint. Then there is heard a crum-bling sound, and the air becomes hotter, and the smoke thicker and more dense, and the

The pressure from behind continued. A lew minutes more and it would be too late to make an effort; death would seize upon them all. Another effort and the banisters gave way, precipitating a number of people on the heads of those below. The stairs are giving way. la au instant all hearts grew still, and despair is on every face. Slowly the stairs seem to sink down and then with a crash give way. With a shout of agony and terror the mass of humanity fall through the gaping opening, lown, down into the pit of death. The floors had given way and the tangled mass of human | Capacity not to exceed 20,000 lbs. beings disappeared as though the earth had opened and swallowed them. The debris from the falling galleries and roof covered them in and buried them as in a grave of tire. Hundreds in this fatal moment were sent out of the world fighting fiercely for life into the presence of their Creator. In the confusion their death was unheard, and no hand was stretched to succor them. Now the flames wrapped the the spot where the mass of the victims fell was in the wide vestibule which runs from Washington street to Flood's alley, within a few yards of the street. The calamity had been so sudden, the progress of the flames so rapid, that little chance had been given for the rendering of assistance. Death came almost instantaneously, and no ery or moan told the firemen or police officers that almost within arm's reach lay hundreds of human beings in their death throes. The falling debris shut out from the view of the spectators in the street the terrible drama that was
